Translation in the Literary Digest. Canada has the best natural means of cause no other college does. Now, of cause no other college does. SALARIES OF COLLEGE WOMEN

MANY WORTHY AMBITIONS CRUSHED BY CONDITIONS.

Why Women Do Not Receive Equal Compensation With Men for Same Class of Work.

From the Independent.

During the past two or three years a noticeable amount of mention has been made of the inadequacy of the college professor's salary and its disproportion to the demands made upon him by the social 723 14th St. N.W. But in the discussion of the professional salary in general small note has been taken, so far as I have observed, of the particular portion of college instructors who have in reality the greatest ground for complaint-i.e., the feminine portion.

The woman who holds a college position has generally not held it very long before she discovers herself face to face with a dead wall, often made sightly by a veil Graded school methods are used with advantage of academic ivy, it is true, but no less of individual attention. worth the scaling, indeed, because there is nothing for her on the other side. Only the satisfaction of having made the climb, along with some scratches and bruises, rewards her for leaving her little grass plot of comfortable mediocrity. Or, in language stripped of floral decoration, the very best college positions open to women, with a few conspicuous exceptions, offer salaries which no man of corresponding scholarship and pedagogic experience would consent to accept. Even the woman who has adorned her name with all the possible academic degrees, and enriched her mind with foreign study and research, finds practically but two alternatives open to her; a professorship in one of the few high-grade colleges for women, where the honor is indeed great but the remuneration small, or a salary similarly small and a subordinate position under some masculine head of a department in a co-educational university. Thus are all the laurels on the other side late her gentle domestic sister, and be content with only a rose in her hair. Such, save in the case of the very few whose conspicuous executive ability has placed them in the chair of president or dean, is the reward of the women who have actually scaled the wall, who are counted as the "successful" and the "able" in the educational world. What of the large number of women instructors and professors in the colleges a degree less great, women by nature equally able, probably, but denied through narrow tige of European study-that winning card which so far outranks all else in the game for favor with the college trus-

And there she will be (minus a second "raise" of salary) at the end of ten years more, unless some fairy godmother secure her passage to Europe or some lover persuade her to transfer her field of research to love and domestic science in an apartment house. For the universally low salary results in a correspondingly low proportion of vacancles in desirable positions. With nothing to be gained by change, women who have once secured what are admittedly the best places to be hoped for by the sex naturally hold on to them. and thus there is not "room at the top." Of course, so long as no other college seeks her, her own college need not pay a great sum to keep her, and the savings out of that sum do not rapidly reach the proportions suggesting study abroad. So she stands helpless at the foot of the wall. I have asked various college presidents and administrators why they did not pay their woman teachers as high salaries as were given to men doing the same grade of work. The first and most conclusive of all their answers is invariably: Becondition prevails. The reasons commonly given are these: Men are not necessarily more successful in the classeither by writing or successful research, giving lectures or attending educational ably advertised, or they are prominent in the civic life of their own community, or they are superior to women in managing mirable means of transport.
